The Kettering Foundation is a nonprofit, operating foundation rooted in the American tradition of cooperative research. Kettering's primary research question is, what does it take to make democracy work as it should? Kettering's research is distinctive because it is conducted from the perspective of citizens and focuses on what people can do collectively to address problems affecting their lives, their communities, and their nation. The foundation seeks to identify and address the challenges to making democracy work as it should through interrelated program areas that focus on citizens, communities, and institutions. The foundation collaborates with an extensive network of community groups, professional associations, researchers, scholars, and citizens around the world. Established in 1927 by inventor Charles F. Kettering, the foundation is a 501(c)(3) organization that does not make grants but engages in joint research with others. For more information about KF research and publications, see the Kettering Foundation’s website at www.kettering.org.

Connections is published by the Kettering Foundation, 200 Commons Road, Dayton, Ohio 45459. The articles in Connections reflect the views of the authors and not necessarily those of the foundation, its directors, or its officers.

© Copyright 2021 by the Kettering Foundation
ISSN 2470-8003
CONTENTS

2 To Work Together, Learn Together
   David Mathews

11 Citizen Space and the Power of Associations: An Interview with John McKnight
   Scott London

17 How Participatory Journalism Created Collaborations between Law Enforcement, Assault Survivors, and Community Advocates
   Sammy Caiola with Jesikah Maria Ross

25 Community Building in an Old-Fashioned Way
   Maura Casey

30 Libraries as Islands of Trust
   Ellen Knutson

38 Rural Life: What Keeps People from Getting Involved?
   Lorie Higgins

46 Redefining Public Safety: Professionals and the Public
   Valerie Lemmie

53 Getting to We: Bridging the Gap between Communities and Local Law Enforcement Agencies in Virginia
   Brian N. Williams

59 Democracy Is a Snowball Rolling Down a Hill: The 2021 Kettering Multinational Symposium
   Wendy Willis

66 Catalyzing Change: Unleashing the Potential of Communities
   Richard C. Harwood
Community Building in an Old-Fashioned Way

By Maura Casey

An experiment in rural community building and democratic citizenship in Alabama has a back-to-the-future feel: Involved citizens see newspapers as key to helping small towns preserve their history and strengthen their communities. They have started four publications this year and hope to start several more.

All well and good, but . . . newspapers? Those old-fashioned things printed on paper with headlines and black type, with ink that sometimes gets a little smudgy and comes off on your hands?

Really?
An experiment in rural community building and democratic citizenship in Alabama has a back-to-the-future feel: Involved citizens see newspapers as key to helping small towns preserve their history and strengthen their communities.

Yes, really, says Jack Shelton. Shelton is leading this effort with PACERS, an Alabama nonprofit organization that he helped found more than 40 years ago to help improve small rural schools. PACERS began at the University of Alabama and the acronym originally stood for Program for the Academic and Cultural Enhancement of Rural Schools. But the organization has long since been identified by its acronym alone and few remember what the words stood for. Its mission has grown also, to encompass a statewide effort to enhance not only schools, but community life in small towns.

The current project, dubbed the PACERS Rural Community Newspaper Network, came about as the result of deliberations conducted in five small towns. The question before the deliberative meetings was, “What is the best thing we can do for our communities?” The answer was, by consensus, “publish local newspapers.”

This is not as strange as it might seem for those of a certain age who remember learning about current events without the help of an active Twitter feed or Facebook posts. Their memories include getting regular newspaper deliveries at home, the better to read over coffee or comment on after breakfast.

Go further back than even several decades ago and the impact of newspapers was even more pronounced. At the turn of the 20th century, Alabama had as many as 1,100 newspapers, mostly weeklies, published all around the state, said Garrett Lane. Lane is a former journalist and digital editor whose career ran the gamut from the Tuscaloosa News to Time, Inc.

He is one of the consultants for the newspaper project and sees the initiative for the community-building exercise it is meant to be. “There may be a pure, forward-looking strain of citizen journalism manifesting itself in what’s been done to date,” he said.
“It’s equally fascinating to imagine this strain of citizen journalism as a root-remedy for media distrust. We probably don’t understand in full what’s taking shape at this stage, though we can sense implications for democracy and community building.”

It might be that rural areas are particularly fertile ground for an idea such as this one. Yet citizens’ desire for a local newspaper was not necessarily motivated by a need to read about high crimes and misdemeanors, fires, floods, or even whether one’s black sheep first cousin made the police log again, all staples of more routine journalism at larger enterprises. Instead, those who felt the need for local newspapers were concerned about other issues.

They were worried that the history of their towns was being lost: the births, deaths, church picnics, and graduations. They were concerned that the ties binding the communities together were not as strong as in years past. And they thought publishing a newspaper would provide a great opportunity for students, not simply in giving them practice being reporters and writers and seeing their names in print, but for learning the business skills necessary to sell ads and peddle copies of the newspapers when they came rolling off the presses.

And roll off they did: 500 copies in each town, selling for a dollar and even two dollars each.

Ultimately, four of the five Alabama communities decided to publish newspapers: the towns of Camp Hill, Beatrice, Pintlala, and Packers Bend. While Pintlala is largely White, the other towns have majority Black populations. The papers are run by volunteers spanning ages from elementary school and high school to retirees.

At this writing in the fall of 2021, all four communities have published two editions. Sift through the papers and you can sense the pride on the tag lines just underneath the mastheads of the newspapers.

Underneath the banner at the top of page one proclaiming the Packers Bend Times, in small type, is the following sentence: “Sharing the stories of our community—yesterday, today, and tomorrow.”

Under the banner of the Pintlala Ledger: “Local people . . . local stories.”

The Camp Hill Chronicle: “A voice & source of information for the community.”

The Beatrice Legacy: “Opening our community up to itself . . . about us, for us.”

And the stories in the newspapers reflect the one-line mission statements, the promises, if you will, printed on the front pages.
Here is what I have learned from their stories:

That Camp Hill elected a mayor, Messiah Williams Cole, who at 21 is the youngest ever to hold office.

That Lassiter’s Hardware in Pintlala is an enterprise more than 100 years old and a place to buy the tools you need and find the odd bolt you might be missing. But it will also leave you, according to the story in the Pintlala Ledger, “with a deep soul connection to the core of who you are.”

That the PACERS raised-bed garden project in Beatrice, the Beatrice Legacy says, feeds people and gives hope, too.

That a convenience store in Wilcox County called the Sugar Shack served as the first African American polling place. In 1966 they stood in line in their Sunday best to cast ballots, according to the Packers Bend Times. But the paper didn’t just write about it; the editor managed to find a photo. The picture is mesmerizing. It shows more than 20 people in line, and they aren’t posing. They are waiting to exercise their democratic right, too long suppressed: ladies in dresses and sensible shoes, purses at their sides; most men wearing suit coats, but one or two in overalls; a few leaning on canes.

Shelton wants to see newspapers
In capturing the big and small happenings of these towns, the residents involved are doing the vital work of democracy. In the process, they will uplift their communities and strengthen the citizenry.

Maura Casey is a Kettering Foundation senior associate and a former New York Times editorial writer. She can be reached at maura@caseyink.com.